THE PERSON BEHIND THE NUMBERS

VALUES & DRIVES

- Every living thing deserves care, not just the ones who can pay for it.
- Nature's patience teaches what urgency cannot.
- Treat symptoms, but never stop hunting the cause.
- Earn trust through steady presence, not promises.

FEARS & WOUNDS

- A plague she couldn't stop in her home village, remembered by name.
- Becoming so practical about death that she forgets to grieve it.
- Wild Shape slipping into instinct she can't fully call back.
- Being needed by everyone and known by no one.

VOICE & MANNER

- Unhurried, exact speech, like she's already triaging the room.
- Asks about sleep and food before asking about danger.
- Silence is a diagnostic tool, not discomfort.
- Warmth arrives in actions before it arrives in words.

LOYALTIES

- The dead of Ashvale, whose names she still recites.
- Anyone too stubborn to admit they're hurt.
- The old herbalist who trained her out of grief.
- Companions who let themselves be tended.

INTERNAL CONTRADICTION

Rowan preaches patience but drove herself past exhaustion trying to outrun a plague. She insists nature keeps better time than people do, while pushing her own body far past its limits whenever someone she loves is at risk.

SIGNIFICANT DETAIL

A cracked ceramic vial, empty, that once held the cure that arrived one day too late.

OPEN THREADS

- Whether Driftmoor's healers know something about the old plague
- Wild Shape instincts she hasn't fully mastered
- The herbalist mentor she hasn't written to in months
