Divination Savant: Time and gold to scribe divination spells into spellbook is halved.
Portent (2/day): After a long rest, roll two d20s and record them. Replace any attack roll, save, or ability check (by anyone he can see) with one of these results before knowing the outcome. Today's Portents: 3 and 17.
Researcher (Sage): When you don't know a piece of lore, you often know where and from whom to learn it.

2nd Level (prepared): Misty Step, Detect Thoughts.

Focus: Knobbed ash staff inset with a moonstone (arcane focus).

sheets of parchment, a small knife for sharpening.
On his person: 22 gp, a small leather notebook (Ilse's letters, a pressed flower), a brass pocketwatch that runs three minutes fast, a tin of strong tea leaves, reading spectacles he loses constantly.
Quirk item: A small smooth pebble from the courtyard at Halstrow. He turns it over in his palm when thinking.

Personality

Trait: Listens twice as long as he speaks, and remembers everything.
Ideal: Knowledge, honestly held. The road to ruin is paved with people who were too certain.
Bond: A leather notebook holding the last letters of a student he lost.
Flaw: Cannot let an interesting question go unanswered, regardless of cost.

Backstory

Hendricks Aldemar Vey spent forty-three years at the Lyceum at Halstrow — student, lecturer, then Master of the Hall of Auspices. He retired four years ago, officially because of his knee, actually because his closest student, Ilse, died on a research expedition he had approved. He has been wandering since, ostensibly compiling field notes for a monograph on the moral weight of foreknowledge. He has written thirty pages in four years.

He came to Driftmoor because his morning auguries pointed here for fourteen consecutive days. He distrusts auguries that insist on themselves — which is precisely why he came. He has been taking long walks, talking to innkeepers, and writing in the notebook. He has a strong sense that something is about to be asked of him, and is, characteristically, neither anxious nor eager. He is curious.
