BACKSTORY

Kaelin grew up trading songs for coin in taverns across the region, learning early that a good story could talk her out of almost any trouble. That confidence cracked the night a tyrannical noble, stung by one of her sharper verses, burned down the inn where she was performing — and several friends who'd sheltered her didn't get out. She carries the guilt quietly, wrapped in the same charm she uses for everything else, and has never quite stopped performing even when the audience is just herself. She travels now with a College of Lore's restless curiosity and a private vow, never spoken aloud, to make her words count for something better than spite.
