Garron Ironvow

PERSONALITY TRAITS

Plainspoken and steady, Garron measures every kindness against a vow he's not sure he's finished paying — he forgives everyone else faster than he forgives himself.

RACE & CLASS PROFILE

Broad and grey-bearded even by dwarven standards, Garron stands like a doorway nothing gets through without his say-so. His beard is bound in three iron rings, one etched with a psalm he recited over his brother's grave. He wears dented chain mail over a threadbare devotional tabard, and his shield bears a hand-hammered sunburst that has taken more blows than his face has.

BACKSTORY

Garron was raised within the Hammerlight Vigil, a dwarven martial order that trains its acolytes as much in scripture as in the shield wall. He and his younger brother swore their oaths together, expecting to serve side by side for decades. His brother died on Garron's watch during a raid gone wrong — a failure Garron has never fully forgiven himself for, though the Vigil absolved him formally within a season. He bound his brother's memory into his beard as a second iron ring, and has worn it, alongside a third etched with a half-remembered psalm, ever since. Garron left the Vigil's halls following a conviction he can't fully explain — a sense that something in Driftmoor will test whether the vow he renewed at his brother's grave still holds. He hasn't decided whether that's providence, guilt, or both, but he's stopped waiting to find out.
